G

G (dʒ), the seventh letter of the Roman alphabet, was orig. a differentiated form of C, q v. In Latin G represented the voiced guttural stop; but in the later period of the language it was probably pronounced before front vowels as a palatal.

In OE. the letter stood for four different sounds, viz. the voiced guttural and palatal stop (g, g), and the voiced guttural and palatal spirant (g, g). In early ME the palatal stop developed into the complex sound (dʒ).

The form ʒ, here employed for ME. words, was commonly used in ME. for the sound of (y) initial and final, for the guttural and palatal unvoiced spirant final or before t (as in mozg, auzt, mezg), and, so long as the sound was in use, for the guttural voiced spirant. From the 13th c., however, the ʒ was by some scribes wholly or partly discarded for y or gh; a few texts have yh.

H (hɛf), the eighth letter of the Roman alphabet, repr. historically Semitic ח, Heth or Aleth, through Gr. Η, Heta, Eta. The Semitic letter represented a laryngeal or guttural spirant, or a rough aspirate, and it was with the aspirate value that the letter was orig. used in Gr. and passed thence into Roman use. In OE., h occurred not only bef. the vowels, but also bef. the consonants l, n, r, w, as in hild loaf, hī / fn raven, etc.; it now stands initially only bef. v-vowels. Its power is that of a simple aspiration or breathing, with just sufficient narrowing of the glottis to be heard bef. a vowel. It is also used to form consonantal digraphs (sh, th, etc.) with simple sounds, and it is often silent, or merely lengthens a preceding vowel.

The name ait goes back through ME. ache to OF. ache, pointing to a late L. acha*, ahha*, or aha*, exemplifying the sound. (The earlier L. name was ha.) Pl. aitches, aites, h's, h's. Comb. H-fice, in a force-pump, a piece standing on the wind bore, under the door-piece, by which the water is forced through the door-piece into the stand-pipe.
